The Jan van Es Institute aims to encourage educational programmes within initial, higher and post-graduate education for healthcare professionals and (clinical) leaders, tutors/trainers and policy makers, to support the integrated primary health care in The Netherlands. It is necessary that professionals and (clinical) leaders work in multidisciplinary teams to deliver integrated primary health care. The initial vocational, graduate and postgraduate education should educate them in that way.

DISCUSSION

- Is working in multidisciplinary teams incorporated in educational programmes in your country? And at the different levels?
- How is this done? Where does it take place?
- What is your experience as far as successes and failures?
- What is your advice for the Jan van Es Institute?
